Clinical Update

A recent placebo-controlled study, published in JAMA Psychiatry and supported by the National Institutes of Health, showed potential improvement in depressive symptoms postmenopausally in women who utilized hormone replacement compared to women who utilized no hormone replacement. “Women in the placebo arm were more than twice as likely to score at least 16 on the Center for Epidemiologic Studies–Depression Scale at least once during the study, compared with women in the hormone therapy arm.” These findings suggest that there is a prophylactic benefit to the use of appropriate hormone replacement for mood symptoms postmenopausally that is independent of any impact that the therapy may have on other menopausal symptoms
